Supervisor Dorsey’s statement on layoffs announced today by District 6 employers, Twitter and Zendesk

San Francisco (Nov. 4, 2022) — Supervisor Matt Dorsey today issued the following statement following news that two technology employers, Twitter and Zendesk, filed notices with City officials today to inform them of layoffs in accordance with the state and federal legal provisions under the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification (or WARN) Act.

Two major employers in the supervisorial district I represent — Twitter and Zendesk — today informed City officials of their intention to lay off a significant number of workers early next year. I have been in regular contact with the leadership of San Francisco’s Office of Economic and Workforce Development, both to ensure that individuals facing joblessness are aware of resources and services available, and to evangelize the need for qualified applicants to fill a wide variety of public sector roles in city departments.

I have also been in contact with San Francisco’s chief economist, Ted Egan, to get a perspective on what the layoffs mean for our City. Although what we’re seeing in our local tech sector is concerning, it is neither necessarily unexpected nor limited to the San Francisco Bay Area. Fortunately — unlike tech-related downturns in years past — California’s current unemployment rate is at an historic low of 3.9 percent. Obviously, overall unemployment rates are... cold comfort to those San Franciscans learning today that they face the prospect of imminent joblessness. For all of them, we hope they avail themselves of the resources and services provided by local and state agencies, and we hope some will consider public sector roles for which the City and County of San Francisco is recruiting.

City officials this morning received a WARN notification from Zendesk informing them that “approximately 84 employees in the state of California” were to be laid off as of Jan. 6, 2023. That number included about 28 San Francisco workers, including many at Zendesk's Market Street headquarters. Later this afternoon, Twitter sent its WARN notification informing City officials that “approximately 784 employees at the S.F. office will be terminated” beginning Jan. 4, 2023.
