BLOCK

est annual report. While 2,472 of its workers were based outside the U.S., it's unclear how many are still in San Francisco or the Bay Area.

Block announced Thursday it plans to cut more than 4,000 of its global employees. The company didn't say how many of those affected by the cuts are based locally. As of Friday morning, the state Employment Development Department had not received any layoff notifications from Block regarding cuts in San Francisco or elsewhere in California.

In a post on the social-media platform X, Dorsey wrote that he was making the cuts was because "something has changed." The AI tools the company is using and developing have "fundamentally" altered "what it means to build and run a company, and that's accelerating rapidly," he wrote.

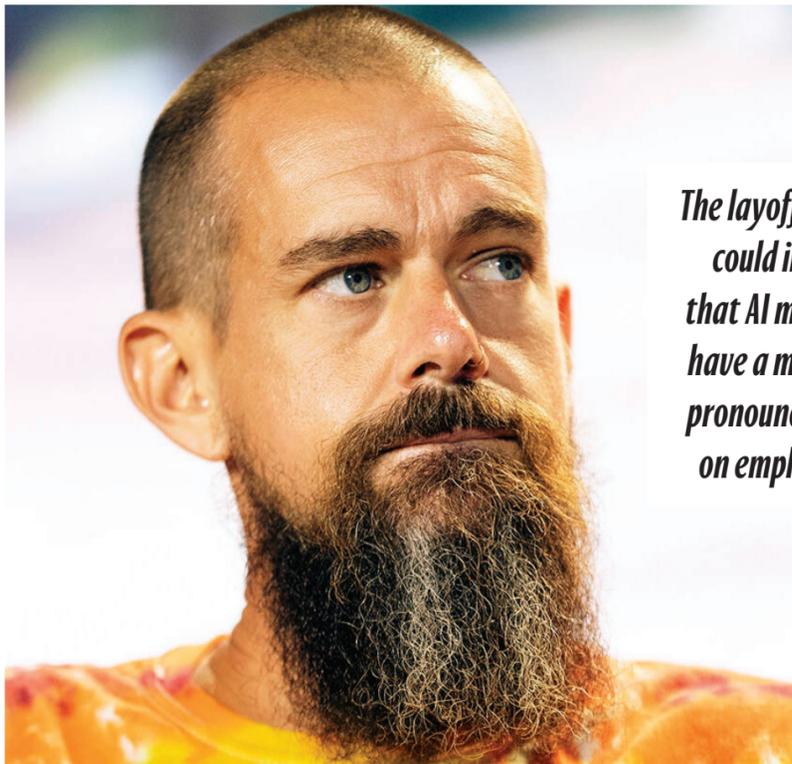

Block representatives did not respond to an email seeking comment about the cuts.

But there's reason to be skeptical about Dorsey's claims.

The cuts came as Block reported that its sales were flat last year and its profit fell by more than half to $1.3 billion. They also came as its stock price had declined 16% over the preceding year.

Dorsey, though, insisted the cuts were not in response to financial pressures.

"We're not making this decision because we're in trouble," he wrote in his post on X. "Our business is strong ... we continue to serve more and more customers."

ALFONSO DURAN © 2021 THE NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY

In a post on social-media site X, Block CEO Jack Dorsey — seen in 2021 — attributed layoffs announced this week to the company's adoption and use of artificial-intelligence tools.

Dorsey and Block also did not disclose what positions the company is cutting or whether the layoffs are focused on particular departments. That makes it impossible to know from the outside whether the company sees the technology gaining traction with specific kinds of tasks or workloads.

The capabilities of AI software-coding tools appear to have jumped significantly in recent months, said James Landay, a professor in Stanford's computer-science department and the co-director of the Stanford Institute for Human-Centered AI. Some startups and founders have shown they can use new AI tools to quickly create prototypes and become more productive, he said.

But many companies have found they can't just easily plug in AI and improve productivity or replace workers, Landay said. Instead, he said, many are discovering that they have to spend a lot of time and effort to redesign their roles and processes to accommodate the technology — and even then, success isn't certain.

"We don't really know which of these things are going to work and which ones are going to be digitization-AI failures as they find it harder to replace people than they thought," he said.

In his X post, Dorsey himself seemed to suggest that Block wasn't entirely certain how its move to replace AI with workers will turn out, Landay said. In the post, Dorsey acknowledged that the move came with "risk" and that Block might have "gotten some of [the cuts] wrong."

He also announced fairly generous severance packages that include a base of 20 weeks' pay plus an additional week for each year of service at the company.

"It almost feels like they're cutting way deeper than they need to, and then they're going to see, 'Where did we mess up?'" and then bring people back," Landay said.
