Section 3. The Administrative Code is hereby amended by adding Chapter 107C, consisting of Sections 107C.1 and 107C.2, to read as follows:

CHAPTER 107C:
AMERICAN INDIAN CULTURAL DISTRICT

SEC. 107C.1. FINDINGS.
The American Indian Cultural District (the "District") is within a geographic region that is of great historical and cultural significance to the American Indian community. This corridor holds a unique concentration of historical events, cultural resources, and Native American-based programming, services, and gathering spaces that are historically and presently important to the American Indian community in the San Francisco Bay Area.
San Francisco is the aboriginal home of the Ramaytush Ohlone Peoples. There are known and documented Ohlone cultural resources and sacred sites within the District, including the home of a once-thriving Ohlone village called "E-la-muh," which was located in the area currently known as Mission Dolores Park. Nearby within the District is Mission Dolores. Many American Indian community members see the Mission as a reminder of the painful history of the Mission Era, which lasted from 1769 to 1833. The missions were created to convert American Indians to Christianity. Historical documentation of missions reflect enslavement, forced religious practices, division of families, forced labor, and cruel punishment including the use of irons and whips. The average lifespan of a Native American in the mission system was ten years. This area holds a unique historical perspective to the American Indian community. First Nations people do not just see a park and a mission, they recognize an area that started as a thriving village site and transitioned to an area of great suffering, where California Native Americans have been buried.

Following the Mission Era, government policies stripped aboriginal people of millions of acres of their land, created boarding schools that ran until the 1970's to "civilize" Indian children, and implemented policies to end government assistance to tribes. In 1952, the Bureau of Indian Affairs implemented an urban Indian relocation program to assimilate American Indians into "modern culture." This program gave Indians one-way tickets to urban areas. San Francisco was one of four counties in California to receive a large influx of American Indians from all over the United States. American Indian people waited for days and weeks at local bus stations for government representatives to meet families and carry out the promise of stable employment and success in the urban cities.

San Francisco was one of the largest relocation cities in the United States. As the urban American Indian population in San Francisco began to expand, the Mission District became a home base for that community. To remedy the lack of adequate government support, the community developed its own support systems, including social services, cultural retention activities, employment and housing opportunities, education, political empowerment, and some of the first urban pow wows.
The community also came together to develop cultural programming, education courses, annual events, Native-owned and supported businesses, community gathering spaces, and an American Indian Cultural Center (AICC). These American Indian-based enterprises and the rich cultural history of the area are at the heart of the proposed District.

The 16th Street corridor was home to the first AICC, located on 16th and Valencia Streets, and the second AICC, located at 223-225 Valencia Street at Duboce Street from 1969 to the 1980s. The AICC was the meeting place for Bay Area American Indian organizations and home of the United Bay Indian Council, which brought together 30 clubs into one large Council. The American Indian Movement originally held an office in the AICC before moving to the International Indian Treaty Council on Mission Street. The buildings that housed the AICC and the surrounding areas hold great importance to the community and have provided a home for historically and politically significant events.

Across the street from the AICC, Al Smith owned a trading post where the Native community came together to sell arts, crafts, and beadwork. Other meeting spots in the area included places such as Aunt Mary's, a cafe across from the Roxie Theater where the Native community would gather for breakfast, and the Rainbow Cattle Company, a bar on Duboce and Valencia Streets. Muddy Waters and Modern Times, popular spots for artists, poetry nights, and speaking engagements, have also been located on Valencia Street. These gathering places reflect the history of a strong cultural connection to the area among Indian Americans.

The District was also at the center of the Red Power/American Indian Movement and was home to famous Native activist, Richard Oakes. Oakes met within the District regularly with Adam Fortunate Eagle, Chairman of the United Bay Area Council of American Indian Affairs, to plan the 1969-1971 occupation of Alcatraz by “Indians of all Tribes.” This movement changed federal Indian termination policies, created a new era of self-determination, and brought attention to the needs of the American Indian community in San Francisco. On February 11, 1978, “The Longest Walk,” a five-month, cross-

The Redstone Building, also known as the Redstone Labor Temple (and formerly called The San Francisco Labor Temple), located at 2940 16th Street, was a hub of union organizing and work activities, historic labor communities, and various programs for over 50 years. American Indian programs that have been housed in this central space for community building include the International Indian Treaty Council, American Indian Film Institute, 500 Years Coalition, and the Big Mountain Support Group.

American Indian events and services initiated in the District continue today, including San Francisco’s first Pow Wow, which initiated at 5051 Mission Street in 1975, and the AICC, which was established in 1968. As of 2019, the AICC is in the process of re-establishing its roots in the District with a Cultural Center to bring back a space for American Indian programming, events, and community services. Other examples of American Indian services that originated and still operate in the District include The Friendship House of American Indians, the Native American Health Center, and American Indian education programs.

The Friendship House of Association of American Indians, located at 56 Julian Street, was established in 1963 as a drop-in center that helped Native people find affordable housing and employment and develop urban survival skills. As of 2019, Friendship House was under the leadership of Helen Devore Waukazoo, who relocated from the Navajo reservation to San Francisco in 1956. Friendship House is the oldest social service agency in the United States run by and for American Indians. Friendship House helps Native people recover from substance abuse, builds job training and education skills, and oversees several community-wide programs. Since Helen Devore Waukazoo became Executive Director in 1980, Friendship House has expanded to two locations including a four-story, 80-bed treatment facility in the District.

The Native American Health Center (NAHC), founded in 1972, is located at 160 Capp Street between 16th and 17th Streets. NAHC was created as a direct result of the needs of American Indians following the Indian Relocation Act of 1956. NAHC expanded to two additional sites to help further meet the needs of Indian people throughout the Bay Area. One office is in Oakland, another site is in Richmond, and NAHC also operates eight school-based health centers. NAHC provides medical, dental and family services to Native Americans and the residents of the surrounding communities. This expansion reflects the needs of American Indians and their ongoing presence in the Bay Area.

Native American education also has roots in the District. The State and Federal Indian Education Program, known in various iterations over the years as Titles IV and VII, was located in the San Francisco Unified School District bungalows at 1950 Mission Street. The Indian Education Program supports the unique educational and culturally related academic needs of American Indian/Alaskan Native students in the San Francisco Unified School District (the “School District”).
In 2014, the Indian Education Program advocated to the School District to be given a permanent services center. Ultimately, through the advocacy of parents, youth, and the larger American Indian community, the School District provided a space for the Indian Education Program at Sanchez Elementary School on 16th Street. The Parent Advisory Committee formed to help determine the Indian Education Program’s goals and advise on the distribution of funds for the program services that will be provided.

In the 2014-2015 school year, the California Department of Education reported over 270 American Indian/Alaskan Native students in San Francisco. The Department found that Native students disproportionately have the highest dropout rate in the School District as compared to students of other ethnicities. The Indian Education Program addresses these academic challenges, but these statistics also reflect the importance of cultural-based programming and a place for American Indian students to connect and be proud of.

While the American Indian community has had its roots in the District from time immemorial, the community also recognizes the shared cultural and historical importance of the area to the Latino community. Since the enactment of the Relocation Act, countless programs, efforts, and support systems have been developed cross-culturally in these communities. In pre-colonial times, Northern Native and Southern Native communities co-existed with intricate trade routes and shared ceremonies. Similarly, in current times, many programs, gatherings and ceremonies take place together and co-exist in this District. American Indians, Latino community organizers, and Southern Native groups have come together to support the District as a small manifestation of justice and repatriation.

According to 2015 Census data, American Indians make up roughly 1.6% of the population in California, and 0.5% of the population in San Francisco. The legacy of American Indians in the Bay Area is in jeopardy due to the increased cost of living, the lack of affordable housing, and lack of safe community space for cultural gatherings and events. The District will help provide a recognized home base for the American Indian community and ensure that American Indian history and contributions will not be forgotten or overwritten. The District will not only benefit the American Indian community, but it will help foster cultural competency in the broader San Francisco community, serve as a model for the rest of California, and honor First Nations people and their longstanding history in San Francisco.
